Course overview

This is a free taster course focusing on your personal experiences and how these experiences may form the basis not only for autobiography and memoir, but for autobiographical fiction and poetry. The course will be composed sections, with a break; each designed to explore one or more areas of personal writing, through discussion, hands-on writing experiments and guidance on how to improve technical aspects of your prose or poetry. By the conclusion of the course you will have completed an introduction to one or two pieces of writing. The course will be mutually supportive, stimulating and a good introduction to further creative writing courses with the popular tutor Stephen Smith.

Course description

The vast majority of creative writing, or allegedly non-fiction memoir, has its origin in personal experience, which is the writer's single greatest resource. Fiction or non-fiction is stimulated by experiences derived from the world, whether those are of other people (characters) or events and experiments. This course will demonstrate how to transform your personal experiences into more dynamic fictional or poetic forms that others may share and relate to. Writing is at root about how we tell stories to each other, and how we thrive on this storytelling urge. We will, therefore, discover how to structure your experiences into effective narrative forms such as short stories or lyrical poems. In doing this, we will also discuss the question of telling the truth in your personal writing, and when this is important or not. Each workshop will be built around the objective of producing the first draft of a piece of work, and we will achieve this aim through simple, stepped writing exercises. Constructive and sensitive feedback will be given at all times and is designed to encourage your success and enjoyment in writing. Taking pleasure in what you write is important and the emphasis will be on your own particular discoveries about yourself through the course
