Course overview

On this course we will examine the following novels: On Chesil Beach - Ian McEwan. Cloud Atlas - David Mitchell (2004) Day - A.L. Kennedy. Affinity - Sarah Waters. The Sense of an Ending - Julian Barnes. These texts will take us inside contemporary British fiction, and earmark those authors who have contributed to the evolution of a distinctive voice in British fiction in the last fifty years, from the years of Thatcher, New Labour to the present. We will explore each writers' techniques and themes, and how they address the themes of British identity. Discussions will be lively with plenty of opportunities to voice your opinions.

Course description

The years 1980 to 2011 were ones which saw enormous alterations in the political and social fabric of Britain, and we will discuss how our authors and texts confronted the themes and problems thrown up by these years, which sought to redefine the nature of British identity in terms of class, gender and sexuality.

Alongside these discussions, we will navigate several defining literary theories which have evolved such as postmodernism, deconstructionalism and the rise of gender theory. These subjects will be approached by close readings and practical analysis of our texts, rather than through dry exegesis. We will assess how literary theories aim to communicate rather than obfuscate communication. Each text is different in its approach to subject, though several will confront the question of how literature addresses historical and societal changes. Others will demonstrate the extravagance of the authors' imaginations, and a preparedness to invent new and alternative worlds in fiction which reflect back on the world of contemporary Britain. This will embrace considerations of class, consumerism, gender and sexuality. By the course's conclusion, one will be aware of the richness of modern British prose and its continuingly vital contribution to global literature.
